Center helps autistic children with speech

The Shafer Center for Early Intervention, a center specializing in autism therapies for children, recently began offering speech and language services, according to a press release.

The service, offered in half-hour or hour-long sessions, are led by a speech pathologist trained to work with autistic children.

Taryn Silbert, a speech pathologist at the center, said she thinks the service is important.

“We obviously have classrooms here and we’re offering early intervention, so we want to offer that service from the very beginning,” she said.
